

Walgreens has new Web site devoted to environment

Jan. 30 -- Drugstore giant Walgreens has a new Web site devoted to the company's impact on communities, including the company's work on environmental issues.

The site, www.walgreens.com/responsibility, was launched this month and includes a variety of information, including efforts to decrease emissions and waste as well as green building, the company said.

"Today's socially conscious consumers, investors and employees are looking for more information about what companies are doing beyond their doors," said Walgreens community affairs director John Gremer.

Walgreens is the nation's largest drugstore chain with 6,636 stores.
